

electron stopping power (in X-ray emission spectroscopy)

When a beam of electrons strikes a target or specimen there are three ways in which the electrons may lose energy (low energy collisions, X-ray production, and formation of a spectral continuum). The average energy loss per unit distance travelled along the electron path is called electron stopping power,  $dE/dx$ .

1980, 52, 2545